

Find Classics Online, Sound Smart.

This past month, my book group decided to read one of Arthur Conan Doyle's most famous Sherlock Holmes novels, *The Hound of the Baskervilles*. As it is a classic, we carry several editions of this title in our system, but I picked one particularly nice copy, *The New Annotated Sherlock Holmes*, which was thick with footnotes, so I could sound smart at our meeting.

However, one day during lunch I realized I had forgotten the book at home, and wanting to catch up on a bit of the story on my break, I checked to see if it was available online. TCCL's Research page lists a collection of links for online books, and one of them, Project Gutenberg, had two print listings (as well as three audio versions) of the Holmes novel, which means I was able to get a dash of murder mystery with my turkey sandwich.

The online books sites are collections of titles that may be reproduced for free, most often because of expired copyright, but there are other qualifiers. This means you can access the full text of many classics with just a few clicks through the library's website.

To find the links, start with the Research tab, scroll down to the Subject Guides, and click 'more' under the Literature heading. Online Books is listed in the Topics section, and the page includes links to 3 sites, The Online Books Page, Bibliomania, and Project Gutenberg.
